Gap junctions are present between reticulospinal neurons, reticulospinal cell precursors and motoneurons. To determine whether gap junctions may regulate glial cell migration, we compared the migration of the arylsulfatase E (Ase)-positive and Ase-negative glial cells after lumbar dorsal rhizotomy in neonatal rats. The appearance of Ase-positive glial cells was delayed in the intact spinal cord as compared to the contralateral side. Six hours after rhizotomy, when transplanted reticular cells had migrated to the Ase-positive zone, the number of migrating cells on the side of rhizotomy was markedly lower than on the intact side. No significant effect of rhizotomy was observed on the cells located distant from the rhizotomy line, in the Ase-negative zone. These findings suggest that gap junction-mediated communication between reticular cells and the target tissue regulates the migration of reticular cells in the developing spinal cord. Combined FLT and FDG PET reveals a case of intraocular graft versus host disease under veno-arterial extracorporeal membrane oxygenation (ECMO) treatment. An 18-year-old man presented with fever and decreased vision. He had received hematopoietic stem cell transplantation (HSCT) 2 years prior for acute myeloid leukemia. He had been treated with autologous peripheral blood stem cells and an intraocular graft versus host disease (IVHG-GVHD) developed. He was diagnosed with IVHG-GVHD by contrast-enhanced MRI, and a left eye enucleation was scheduled. However, his condition suddenly worsened and he was transferred to our hospital under veno-arterial ECMO. His pretreatment serum levels of immunoglobulin G, M, and E were all within the 3ef4e8ef8d
