Extracellular adenosine 3',5'-cyclic monophosphate, thyroid hormone, and steroid hormones in thyroidectomized, hyperthyroid, and hypothyroid rats. The production of extracellular adenosine 3',5'-cyclic monophosphate (cAMP) was studied in primary cultures of heart cells obtained from euthyroid, thyroxine (T4)-treated, and thyroidectomized rats. The cAMP levels were not different in cells from the three groups. cAMP production by rat heart cells was inhibited by a number of compounds known to inhibit cAMP-dependent protein kinase. Among the most potent inhibitors were thyroid hormone (T3) and cortisol. The ability of T3 and cortisol to inhibit heart cell cAMP production was observed in the following order: hypothyroid > hyperthyroid > euthyroid. This order was similar to the order of their effect on cAMP-dependent protein kinase activity in the heart. Both thyroid hormone and glucocorticoids also stimulated in vitro growth of rat liver cells in culture. However, thyroid hormone and glucocorticoids had a greater effect on the growth of cells obtained from hyperthyroid rats than from euthyroid rats. The inhibitory effect of thyroid hormone on heart cell growth was also observed in in vivo studies with adult rats which were thyroidectomized, thyroidectomized with T4 replacement, or which had been exposed to T4 in drinking water. These results indicate that thyroid hormone may inhibit heart cell growth by a mechanism that is independent of its effect on cAMP production by heart cells.
