As computing devices become more ubiquitous in everyday life, the number of devices that can exchange data using the Universal Serial Bus (USB) protocol grows accordingly. Also, it is often desirable to combine data from different sources into a single data stream, such as a multimedia stream. For instance, a USB host can aggregate multiple audio and video streams from multiple USB-compatible devices in order to broadcast a USB-compatible multimedia stream. The USB protocol can use a special packet called the "Zero-Length Packet" (ZLP) to signal the end of the packet stream to a device. However, use of the ZLP requires the USB protocol to recognize the end of the packet stream at the beginning of the packet stream. To date, the USB protocol has not been extended to handle incomplete packet data streams (i.e., streams that do not include an entire packet in the packet stream)./* * Copyright (C) 2011-2018 Intel Corporation. "It was so cold out on the water and we kept talking for several hours," he said. "We were sharing stories." Mr. Murray said he could not begin to imagine the emotions of the father and the son left behind. "I don't think it's possible to be fully cognizant of the whole thing," he said, his voice cracking. "There's just no way." Note that the son barely mentions his father in the narrative, and only as one of many things the father took on an Island trip. It seems the son never wanted his father to stop and think about his loss.This Little Turlock Bedding Company Is Making Top-Flight Shorts The company is challenging the concept that only high-end designs are worth taking seriously.
