The aim of this paper is to compare various Monte Carlo methods for simulating the transmission of mammography X-rays in practical terms, including the time taken to compute results, the accuracy of dose distributions, and the detailed features of the phantom used. Two Monte Carlo codes that have found widespread use in the mammography literature were selected, namely MCMLX (GEANT) and MCMLX-PENELOPE (FLUKA). Three phantoms were used to assess dose homogeneity in the breast tissue, and each phantom was scanned with several different angular and energy distributions of X-rays to give an indication of the types of X-ray diagnostic procedures that could be simulated. These include: lateral mammo-grams; conventional projections (with greater penetration in the sagittal direction); tomosynthesis; conventional mammography; tomosynthesis with double the dose in each cycle; low dose scans; spot views; low dose spot views; and repeat lateral scans. The effects of different levels of beam hardening and scatter were also investigated in the breast tissue, using an MCMLX-based system. Dose distributions and angular distributions for the different X-ray systems in the phantoms are presented and compared. MCMLX calculations for the mammography, tomosynthesis and tomosynthesis double dose scenarios, each of which use scatter fractions of 25, 40 and 50% respectively, are also compared to the corresponding MCMLX-PENELOPE calculation. In general, the two Monte Carlo codes give very similar results and are accurate in a radiation dose range of interest for mammography, assuming the models are correctly validated. MCMLX-PENELOPE is found to be slower than MCMLX, and also offers little extra facility in simulating scatter or beam hardening.Q: How to clean a crumbled cake?
