for Windows In a video call it's common for the audio to become a bit "numb," causing trouble for on-screen players and callers alike.

Thankfully, you don't have to rely on awkward phrases like "um" and "uh" while on a video call. There are actual emojis that you can use to spice up the audio on a video call, and a new animated series will even show you how. Yes, you read that correctly. The internet community emoji keyboard (which does not support text) has been introduced to the world on Apple's app store. It is available for free for iOS devices, meaning it is compatible with iPhones, iPads and other iOS devices. The Apple iPhone app store is full of applications that are universal among Apple's devices, even if they are dedicated apps for a particular manufacturer. For example, if you have a Macbook Pro and an iPhone, you can see every app that is native to both Mac and iOS in the iTunes app store. While there are apps that are available for multiple manufacturers, many in-house apps do not have the option to be used on a wide range of devices, and of course there are some apps that are only available on devices from a single manufacturer. The emoji keyboard is not a new app by any means. As it turns out, the emoji keyboard is pretty similar to the Emoji Converter. Emojis are Unicode characters, which means they can be displayed in many places, from emails to social media platforms. The Emoji Converter is designed to help Android users translate the Unicode character set into bitmaps, and the same service was also previously available on iOS. With the new emoji keyboard, iOS users will be able to quickly type in emojis, turning them into Unicode text. Even though

Among the many fascinating aspects of marine biology is the story of ocean acidification, the process in which the oceans are changing from a pH of about 8.2 to 7.8, so its waters are becoming increasingly corrosive. Scientists have known about ocean acidification since the late 1970s and have suspected that it would have a strong impact on plankton, the photosynthetic microorganisms in the oceans that make half of the oxygen we breathe. In 2014, a team of researchers published a paper in Nature Geoscience that predicted mass losses of the tiny plankton Caenodonte species if ocean acidification continued unabated, though within a year marine biologists had published another paper in the journal that proved the researchers' calculations were wrong, but by then it was too late. In 2017, a team of UC Berkeley scientists published a paper in Nature explaining how another group of plankton species, called coccolithophores, are evolving to resist these anticipated effects of ocean acidification. For this study, the researchers looked at two different species of coccolithophores in the California Current System, tropical regions with an annual cycle of tides and currents that move water north or south along the coast of North America. If you follow the currents, you can see that the coastal waters of California are influenced by the El Niño and La Niña seasons of the Pacific Ocean.

La Niña conditions, which tend to be warmer and wetter, are the opposite of the El Niño seasons, which tend to be cooler and drier. As you can see from the diagram below, the La Niña seasons tend to be cooler and drier in California. But they're different from each other: the waters near the coast of California are typically cooler and there's more onshore wind, which causes more turbulent conditions and a tendency for rainstorms. The ocean is changing rapidly and becoming more corrosive. During the year, coccolithophores in the California Current System grow, reproduce and die in a cycle that allows them to survive through the long La Niña seasons but also to do well through the warmer El Niño seasons. As these plankton species build their skeletons from calcium carbonate, some of them will dissolve during the process. The amount of calcium carbonate they'll dissolve is dependent on the temperature of the water. The cooler the water is, the more calcium carbonate they dissolve, and if ocean acidification continues the water will be even cooler. At the same time,

Reduction of protein-protein cross-links in the heart of the senescence-accelerated mouse strain P3-6. The senescence-accelerated mouse (SAM) strain P3-6 manifests an age-related atrial dilation and conduction disorders, followed by spontaneous death at 36-45 weeks of age. The present study showed that the amount of protein-protein cross-links in the heart was significantly increased as the age of P3-6 rats increased. Furthermore, a significant amount of oxidative stress was detected in the heart of the P3-6 rat, and the activity of Cu/Zn superoxide dismutase was significantly reduced. When a mixture of thiol-containing antioxidants, N-acetyl-l-cysteine (NAC), glutathione (GSH), homocysteine (Hcy), carnosine, l-selenomethionine (SeM), l-methionine (Met), and N-acetyl-d-l-cysteine (NAC), was administered orally (200 mg/kg, three times a week) for 6 weeks, the atrial dilation and electrophysiological disorders were significantly reduced in P3-6 rats. The amount of protein-protein cross-links in the heart of P3-6 rats treated with the mixture of antioxidants was significantly reduced, as was the amount of oxidative stress, together with an increase in the activity of Cu/Zn superoxide dismutase. These results suggest that the oxidative damage of the heart may be responsible for the atrial dilation and conduction disorders, and the mixture of antioxidants, NAC and thiols containing compounds, may be useful for the treatment of senile cardiac disorders.]
