I have to admit I'm surprised there are so many of them, as most are only 512 x 512, and it's quite a few. Anyway, the icons look a bit large on my screen. I have to zoom in a little to get the whole icon on my screen. It's just an issue of the screen and the icons that I find myself having to zoom in a little. I hope it doesn't confuse my readers if the icons are too big. One problem I have is that some of the icons, such as the app icon, do not show their true sizes, but I believe that is because it's a selection of iPhone's screens. Still, if they're true sizes, it would be nice to have a few more icons, such as contact and phone. Saturday, March 26, 2009 Google offers this series of daily articles, which I've been checking out. They're not links to full articles, but they're more than just a list of links: it's a good, well-written, well-illustrated summary of what's happening in technology on a daily basis. This is the first one: Looks like 2009 is going to be a good year for mobile devices! PS: I liked the use of text-to-speech to provide audio, with a voice that was low and clear. Very nice.

Wednesday, March 2, 2009 While a video is as viral as it can be (especially with online shows like "Jersey Shore") video has a bad reputation for being "spammy" or "low quality". But I think video is going to come back - if only because the whole new content and distribution model has made the quality a lot easier to control. "The business model has to be seen as an end unto itself," [Microsoft VP of corporate communications] says. "We're not going to be relying on the platform-provider market any more to take care of distribution. We're going to create content, we're going to produce great content"
