Photoshop's History panel enables you to easily restore previous versions of your image. Many versions of Photoshop, and many types of computer programs, now offer image-manipulation features that are similar to Photoshop. You can find out more about these features and see their capabilities in the following sections. Photoshop is designed to improve your overall image quality by using specific tools for enhancing your photographs or images. It's not designed to make you a graphics artist, but it can improve your images by eliminating problems or simplifying the appearance of your images. Photoshop's powerful tools are covered in Chapters 7, 8, 9, and 10. Mixing channels of light and dark The powerful Adjustment panel in Photoshop has a new feature called the Channel Mixer that enables you to use a channel of light and dark to correct issues in a selected area or layer of the image. In the new Photoshop Photoshop CS2 menu, in the Adjustments panel, the Channel Mixer is selected by default. Click the red arrow next to the Channel Mixer to open it and see the icon in Figure 1-3. When you have an image open in Photoshop, right-click (Windows) or Control-click (Mac) the Channel Mixer icon and choose Level of Light and Level of Dark from the menu that appears. Photoshop CS2 has the most extensive range of colors and levels that you can adjust in any color selection. Figure 1-3: The Channel Mixer icon allows you to use the Adjustment panel to perform detailed corrections. The Channel Mixer enables you to change the amount of light and dark in any selected area of the image. You can adjust Light and Dark by using a slider or by pressing Enter. In this fashion, you can correct problems like areas of over- or underexposure, reduce contrast, create subtle softening in overcast skies, and remove shadows or other problems that may be present in an image. After you apply levels to an image to correct a problem, you can reduce the amount of Light and Dark when you create a new image or move the Adjustment layer to a different area of the photo. The field of the invention is lens surface finishing and the invention is particularly concerned with the finishing of the surfaces of the optical elements of a contact lens. In manufacture, many contact lenses are formed of polymeric materials which are placed in a mold having one or more concave molding surfaces that correspond to the lens shape. Since the lenses are optically finished surfaces, it is important to remove any surface defects in the molding surfaces of the mold to ensure good optical quality of the finished lens. If the lens is intended for a person's eye, the lens is usually removed from the mold and finished as a final optical component of the eyeglass lens. The finishing of the lens is usually in the form of an ultraviolet (UV) photochromic finishing process. This is a relatively time consuming process that requires at least two curing steps. The first curing step is performed using a conventional UV photo curing process to cure the outer surface of the lens. The second curing step is performed using a free radical curing process to cure the UV photochromic tint that forms the optical coating. Because the tint is normally formed as a UV photochromic coating, both the surface of the lens and the exposed surface of the mold are normally coated with the photochromic paint. These two surfaces are then exposed separately to UV radiation. The exposure cures the tint forming surface while the tint from the exposed surface remains uncured. An exposed lens surface can be removed from the mold by heating the mold to a temperature above the glass transition temperature of the tint forming coating, without substantially softening the lens surface. There are a number of problems with the conventional process described above. The exposure of two surfaces of the lens to UV radiation requires a careful coordination of the times of application of the radiation and the temperature of the lens. The coordination is also difficult because the tint forming surfaces are formed of a coating and so may be somewhat opaque and the optical quality of the coating may be difficult to assess. These problems are compounded by the fact that the coated surfaces are sometimes difficult to access because the tinting process is normally applied to the outer surfaces of the lens mold. A more conventional process that includes a single curing step can be used. In this process, the lens is removed from the mold after the tint forming coating has been cured. The lens is then coated with a photochromic coating which is visible under a light source. The surface of the lens is then finished. In the first two processes, the lens is usually finished by hand
