* Layer There are many layers in Photoshop that you may need to create, edit, and work with. Most people, when they open a new document in Photoshop, find the canvas ready to work with to create graphics that you can later edit. It's true that all of Photoshop's layers are visible, but hidden layers are pretty tough to see. You can show only those layers that you want to see or hide all of the layers that you don't need to see. You may also create a new layer and apply the layer to both images or to a specific section of a single image (see the sidebar for more details).

* Orientation We recommend that you create a new document with the easiest layout possible.

There are two ways to do this.

You can create a document in the traditional portrait orientation

(width to height) and then rotate this new portrait orientation into landscape mode (height to width). Or, you can create a new document in landscape mode and then rotate it into portrait mode

(see the previous sidebar for more details). * Slide Show

The Slide Show command is a great way to make a slide show with your images; however, if you do not have layers, this feature is unavailable. To create a slideshow with layers, you can use the Extract Collection command (Export⇒Export As...) followed by the Create Slide Show command (View⇒Slide Show). This process creates a new document and layers in the same way that you create a new document with the canvas open.

All of the most-requested features are available.

Q: Output unary prefix-circular notation? Is there a mathematical notation which permits printing an n-adic number using unary prefix circular notation? That is, I want to print the string $$123 \cdots 1$$ with a full cycle of "1" at the start, then a fixed number of iterations of "1", then another full cycle at the end. I know that unary prefix circular notation cannot be used to print binary strings, since there would be an infinite number of "0"s left over. However, we can define unary prefix circular notation for any unary prefix. I don't know if it's possible to do that with an iterated n -ary symbol. Pauline Marois is to become the first woman to lead the National Assembly, and the first person to become head of government following an independence referendum in Quebec's history. In December, the long-time separatist leader called a referendum on sovereignty within 18 months after the separatist Bloc Quebecois caucus retained a clear majority in the Quebec National Assembly. The provincial government invited the federal government to negotiate a takeover agreement with it, which would give the elected National Assembly control over day-to-day affairs of the province and the corresponding responsibilities of governing. 1,000 kilometers separate Quebec is about 2,000 kilometers (1,200 miles) from the federal government in Ottawa. On the way are Calgary, Edmonton, Winnipeg and St. John's. "I don't think any other Canadian would be asked to govern a province 2,000 kilometers away from Ottawa, from the capital, and in the whole world, you would ask a federal government to do that," Marois said in an interview with the Canadian Broadcasting Corp. "I would never say that this is a step or a bridge. It's rather a transition

Live Nation Entertainment is in talks to buy another four percent interest in Coachella and Stagecoach, the company announced today. The previous round of investment in the music festivals, which took place in 2015 and 2016, added some important momentum to those companies and really brought the business to where it is today. The new investment rounds will be “consistent with the desire to build on and fully take advantage of the entrepreneurial success that has been experienced in the last two years,” according to a release. The deal is expected to be finalized in the coming weeks.

“The demand for our festivals has proven to be as high as the demand for our music. We are continuing to expand our festival footprint and continue to be on the forefront of music, as we’ve shown in the past two years,” Live Nation CEO Michael Rapino said in a statement. Back in 2015, the company said the investments would bring in $1.6 million in revenue for the festivals in 2017. At the time, Coachella was growing by an average of 50 percent in ticket sales, while Stagecoach was growing by 25 percent. The investments also brought on a few new projects: a Coachella film division (which launched a year later) and the Coachella documentary The Coachella Effect. “We’ve learned a lot from this past year’s investments, from the positive revenue growth to strengthening our investment structure,” said George Goldner, co-president of Goldenvoice, the partnership that operates both festivals. “We have the backing to continue to grow and are excited to enter into more collaborations with various labels and artists. We’re also excited to continue adding new features and upgrades to our premium features, such as the Coachella Afterparty and the Coachella Village.” Coachella has been on a mission to spread its influence across the music world, and from its partnership with streaming service Tidal and its smaller festival, Carpool Karaoke Live, to its increasing support of underground, independent and local music, Coachella has been a strong force for good. And the business model has allowed for artists to earn more money, with both Coachella and Stagecoach now giving out between $33,000 to $38,000 per act (with smaller acts earning even more) and getting more than $1 million in sponsorship revenue per year.

Live Nation also owns the Prima
