Note Photoshop layers are implemented slightly differently in Photoshop CS6, Photoshop Elements, and Photoshop CC, but the principles of working with layers remain the same. In Photoshop Elements and Photoshop CC, creating new layers is done by clicking the New Layer icon. In Photoshop CS6, you create new layers by using the menu in the Layers palette. Layers help you to keep a record of what is in your image because they provide a way to switch and hide them or to combine them into a new layer. The process of turning a section of a picture, for example, into a different layer is called `_layer masking_`. With layer masking, you can easily hide portions of an image, such as the horizon, sky, or background. To switch layers, use the Layer Selector in the Layers palette. Chapter 3 explains how to use this feature. # The Layers Pal

Q: Is the natural way to deploy a website the same as the "Package" deploy? I'm a bit confused about what package deploy actually does in Google App Engine. I did some research and I didn't find a definitive answer to that question. A simple question can also be used to identify the answer: Does deploying a website mean that all the files are compiled and then uploaded to the server? If I run a website like `www.webpage.com` in appengine, and I do that with the "package deploy", does that mean I should do the same thing with "deploy"? A: You can have a list of URLs you want to "deploy" to your app. You can do so either by entering the urls in `app.yaml` or by creating files like "index.html" and uploading them to your Google account. These URL's will be accessible from your app. Once you've created the files you want, google will at some point upload the files and during this process will read `app.yaml` and reroute requests to your files in your app. Once you've setup your webapp and uploaded your files, you can enter the first URL you want your app to serve into `app.yaml` and set the application's Host header (by default it's `app.yaml`). App Engine will then be serving your default index file at this url. You can make changes in `app.yaml`. If you do so, you have to rerun appcfg.py update_parsed_yaml updates_file_yaml to actually apply these changes to the app.){ref-type="table"}.

We put up a great set of photos of Jägermeister founder Erdmann Jacoby yesterday, but someone posted a GIF on Twitter that made us stop and think. It showed the company's ads on a time map, with the countries they're appearing in. It's a bit like retro tourism in space. It's incredible. We first stumbled upon it when we saw a tweet from the Colombian health minister about the marketing company that promoted a Jägermeister flavour with caffeine called "Jäger Puff on the Go". We took that to mean that rather than having the ad on Twitter, as they usually do, they were now actually promoting Colombian coffee, which would be an interesting marketing move in that country, due to the stigma some still have around both the drink and caffeine. Then this popped up. This is different. The fact that the Jägermeister ads were all here implies that it really is a tourist in space in the sense that they're promoting a drink in different countries. As someone who tried visiting various planets, an interesting one to see is the one where the "Ha!" campaign took place, which was where Jägermeister played an alien

"bleep bleep" sound that sounds like a signal from a jetpack. It's the same sound they use in the new "Space Jägermeister" ad campaign we have up in the right-hand corner above. Yep, that's the exact sound! This story goes deeper than just ads on Reddit, or GIFs in Brazil. If anyone out there knows more about this, do let us know, because it's a really unusual advertising campaign.Q: SELECT CASE, how to pass the values of this query as a variable? I have a query to select case by a query. The query is OK as it runs when executed directly in SQL server. But it's not running when I run the query in access where I tried to assign the values of the query to a variable. This is my code: "IF OBJECT_ID('tempdb..#_TableName') IS NOT NULL DROP TABLE #_TableName DECLARE @dbValue NVARCHAR(5) = CAST(@dbValue AS VARCHAR(5))"
