Avian retinal degeneration (RD) is a retinal degeneration in chickens and another non-human bird, the zebra finch. In these birds, massive degeneration of rods and cones occurs in the retina without any evident loss of photoreceptors in the adjacent pigment epithelium. In this study, we compared the retinal phenotype between RD chickens and normal chickens by immunohistochemical study of retinal sections, and found massive loss of cones in RD retina but no apparent loss of cones in normal retina. In the normal retina, cones were observed surrounding the inner nuclear layer of the retina, but not in the outer nuclear layer. In the RD retina, however, some cones in the outer nuclear layer were also found. Cones containing rhodopsin were observed in the normal retina, but rarely in the RD retina. Melanopsin was not detected in cones of normal retina, but was colocalized in some of cones of RD retina. The results suggest
