Elevated serum leptin levels might be associated with insulin resistance, which is a known risk factor for the development of systemic sclerosis. However, the expression of leptin and its receptors in the skin and blood of patients with systemic sclerosis has not been investigated. We evaluated leptin and its receptors in mononuclear blood cells (MNCs) from 26 patients with systemic sclerosis, including 12 patients with short disease duration, and in MNCs and skin biopsy specimens obtained from 20 controls. In contrast to controls, serum leptin levels were elevated in patients with systemic sclerosis. The expression of the leptin receptor and its splicing variants LeptinRb and LeptinRa was elevated in MNCs from patients with systemic sclerosis, and there was a tendency toward a correlation of LeptinRb with the serum leptin level. In skin biopsy specimens from patients with systemic sclerosis, the expression of leptin was increased both in dermal and epidermal cells, and the expression of leptin receptor was enhanced in dermal cells surprisingly good condition for a building of its age. (Though, of course, a quite a lot of the building has been modified, to the extent that it has ceased to resemble the original design, especially if you peer beneath the present use of the building – a mixture of debates and timetables, and the casual use of the upstairs as the Westminster parliamentary square. It is not an entirely pleasant mix). Unsurprisingly, the room is a popular haunt for members of the Lords when they have free time, so the camera should have found much of the chamber empty. In fact, it's packed full. One busy, competing image shows the room busy, but lacking any empty chairs.

That's when you realise that plenty of the Lords – not just the most influential, senior members – will be present, taking their turn at holding the government to account. It's not unusual for Lords to show up even during Prime Minister's Questions. ... when you miss it. In fact, your presenter notes that the cap is upon the Lords, but the camera catches a close up of a group
