A natural disaster is a natural phenomenon that severely damages or destroys a part of the Earth. The most common kinds of natural disasters are geological, such as earthquakes and volcanoes; meteorological, such as typhoons and thunderstorms; and meteorological, such as floods and hurricanes. What makes a natural disaster different from other kinds of disasters is that the damage of the disaster cannot be prevented by preventing a harm or hazard, such as a dam or a nuclear explosion, from striking. Most natural disasters are caused by a natural disaster, such as a volcanic eruption, a flood, or an earthquake. They are of different magnitudes and different levels of destructiveness. Magnitude refers to the significant effect of the disaster. The most significant of these are the end-of-the-world type of natural disasters, such as the 1980 eruption of Mount St. Helens, which resulted in the deaths of 57 people and the destruction of more than 400 bridges; the Galápagos Islands Volcano, which erupted 2,400 years ago, and is considered a natural disaster in the most recent geological history of the Earth (5 million years ago), and produced lahar, earthquakes, ashfall and the collapse of the largest lava dome ever recorded on Earth; and the 1184 Mw Indian Ocean Tsunami, which is the most destructive of all major natural disasters. A disaster can be local, regional, national or international in scale, and local and regional disasters usually are caused by natural hazards, such as tsunamis, earthquakes, volcanoes or landslides. Natural disasters are distinguished from manmade disasters, such as industrial accidents, weapons of mass destruction and nuclear disasters, by the inability to prevent or mitigate a disaster. There are large environmental disasters, such as the Chernobyl disaster, which was caused by a human failure in a nuclear reaction; and there are extinction-level events, such as the Chicxulub crater, which was caused by the impact of an asteroid in the early Cretaceous period 65.5 million years ago. Many natural disasters occur in the absence of humans. Examples include ecological disasters, such as coral reefs bleached by unusually high levels of oceanic heat, landslides or mudslides in very moist areas, and floods caused by melting snow and ice, although these kinds of natural disasters are usually referred to as "unusual". Many people attribute increasing power to humans' ability to destroy the environment and to destroy their own habitats. For example, they assert that
