Brief History PhotoShop originated in 1984 at Apple Computer. It was originally called Photo Editor, and it was developed by three Apple employees who came from Deluxe Software, which was founded by Art Fry, Bill Unger and Dennis Fry. The history of PhotoShop is fascinating. It was developed by Art Fry and Bill Unger. The two got together to develop the software. Bill Unger came from Deluxe Software. Art Fry was a former Deluxé member. Dennis Fry was a Deluxé president. You never know who started the software or even when it started out. It has been around for a while and was launched in 1984 and then Adobe acquired the rights to the program in 1987. When Adobe acquired the software, they worked with the original developer to bring the software to the masses. Adobe did a great job with the product. Adobe, as a company, used its best resources and team to help the developers come up with a successful product. Today, PhotoShop continues to be a pretty big name in graphics. It is a very good software for editing photographs and images in general. More than 90% of the world's businesses use Photoshop. As a result of that, PhotoShop has become a staple in almost all businesses. Main Features Photoshop PhotoShop is an image manipulation program that makes it easy for users to change the look of raster images. It is very helpful because, when images are processed with a photo editor, the look of the image can change drastically. Here are the main features of Photoshop: Changing Colors or Adjusting the Contrast or Saturation: Photos can be edited with levels. These levels include the following: Black and White Levels Sepia and Colorize Contrast, Saturation, Gamma and Lut Color Balance and Curves Colorize Grayscale Hue and Saturation Levels: Black Levels White Levels Sepia Levels Color Levels Contrast Levels Gamma Levels LUT Levels Curves Colors Black and White Noise A flood tool Chroma Chroma Key Unsharp Mask Specularity History and editing PhotoShop has multiple levels of history and editing. You can use some of the steps from the preceding levels for the next a shortfall in the protective belt was a "casual" or "inadvertent" omission, and thus not a breach of duty. See Burns, 659 N.E.2d at 1128-29. 6 The dissent relies upon an excerpt from a deposition of Dr. Binder. However, this testimony is a part of Dr. Binder's deposition that the district court had refused to consider, and thus is not properly before us. We can therefore review only the holding, which was that the record contained no evidence that there was a "causal connection between [this] transmission of HIV and any injury, illness, or disease suffered by plaintiff." Hence, I cannot see how the conclusion of causal connection is compelled by the evidence that the "excessive force" was the only incident that could cause transmission of HIV. It is perfectly possible that someone who is HIV-positive can suffer any injury during a beating, and that the injury would not cause the virus to be transmitted to others. 7 The dissent suggests that the availability of the cause of action would have been a deterrent to abuse, and thus deterrence would have been one of the ends of the state. The novel way in which we are called upon to defend this novel social theory makes this a tenuous argument. We can imagine a prison or jail where the staff would believe that plaintiffs would be deterred from the excessive use of force if they knew that it would cause them to contract a fatal disease—but we are certainly not persuaded that this is the case. 8 The plaintiffs urge that the fact that the Indiana legislature could not foresee the result of their action is not sufficient to establish vagueness. They note that the Indiana legislature, like legislatures throughout the country, is often caught unaware of the legal consequences of legislation. A vagueness challenge is founded upon the due process clause and implicates the constitutionality of the statute. "The lack of specificity of a vagueness challenge, however, does not mean that the plaintiffs cannot prevail: 'The Court's decisions make it perfectly clear that the void-for-vagueness doctrine is a strongest of presumptions and that it is a command that leans heavily against any attempt to restrict or dilute the freedom of speech and expression.'" Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601, 608, 93 S.Ct. 2908, 2913, 37 L.Ed.

Preliminary data presented in this proposal show that the soluble APPalpha(SAP) and beta(SAP) are highly enriched in the plasma membrane, as determined by cell fractionation, biochemical analysis and immunofluorescence labeling of plasma membrane sheets using anti-epitope antibodies against SAP. The enrichment of SAP in plasma membranes is dependent on the presence of lipids, for which there are currently no clear explanations. The goal of this proposal is to develop an integrated plan of experiments designed to explore the following hypotheses concerning SAP: (1) The lipid dependence of the plasma membrane enrichment of SAP suggests that SAP may be aggregated by interactions with specific lipids within membranes. The membrane components that specifically interact with SAP will be identified and characterized. (2) The highly restricted distribution of APP within the brain suggests that the selective aggregation of APP may play an important role in the distribution of Alzheimer disease plaque material and neurofibrillary tangles. The distribution of APP in tissues and cells from different organs, as well as in developing and adult brains, will be investigated. (3) The selective aggregation of APP molecules in the brain may be regulated by various plasma membrane, cytoskeletal and cytosolic factors, and therefore, SAP distribution may be regulated by various plasma membrane, cytoskeletal and cytosolic factors. The regulation of SAP localization and aggregation by these factors will be studied. The specific aims of the proposal include: (1) to identify the plasma membrane lipid components which mediate the enrichment of SAP in the plasma membrane; (2) to identify the structural domains of APP which are responsible for the selective aggregation of SAP; (3) to characterize the mechanisms regulating the localization and aggregation of APP; (4) to characterize the spatial
