Q: When to use Lambda, When to use POJO? I am developing an android application. In that there is login functionality as well as Registration form. In registration form there is option to add more then one user. I have used multi-select to choose multiple users. There are many many ways to implement multiselect. Lambda as per my understanding when to use lambda, selections.add(c -> c.getName().equals("Chris")); selections.add(c -> c.getName().equals("Dee")); multi-select, as per my understanding multi select can be used to select multiple values from a collection. ArrayList names = Arrays.asList(getStringArray("name"), getStringArray("name2")); MultiSelectAdapter customAdapter = new MultiSelectAdapter(selectListActivity, layoutResourceId, names); and then set the adapter to multi-select. multiselect.setAdapter(customAdapter); I can't decide whether to use POJO or lambda. I would appreciate if anyone can suggest which is better. Thank You. A: Lambdas makes it easier to add logic to your model. While I think the multi-select example is a bit convoluted and unnecessary, an example of something useful with lambdas is the case when you have an API that returns a List (for example) but you only care about the contents of that list once. In that case, you would use a Lambda. Another example is where you have two methods that perform similar tasks on the same data but only one of those should be called at one time. You could use a Lambda to make the decision, and then call one method or the other in the code path of the method that isn't appropriate for that use-case. A: A lambda is more useful if you have some code you want to run that you want to change based on the argument that's being passed to it. In other words, the logic you want to run is different in each case
