Treatment options for liver malignancies in cirrhosis. Hepatocellular carcinoma (HCC) is the fifth most common malignancy worldwide and its prevalence is increasing, particularly in cirrhotic patients. Despite surgery, the efficacy of this treatment modality is limited by the underlying liver disease. Recent advances in the understanding of molecular and cellular biology of this disease have renewed interest in the use of chemotherapy or liver-directed therapy. The Liver Cancer Study Group has classified HCC into 4 categories: HCC derived from liver cells unrelated to a known liver disease, such as a primary (de novo) tumor; HCC derived from inflammatory or fibrocellular tissues in the liver; HCC occurring in an established liver disorder, such as primary biliary cirrhosis; and HCC associated with other carcinomas. The management of these different categories of HCC is discussed, with special emphasis on HCC in cirrhosis. Many well-designed randomized controlled trials have shown that chemotherapy, especially a combination of cisplatin and 5-fluorouracil, increases survival of patients with HCC in the de novo stage. However, the efficacy of combination regimens, especially with regard to the survival of patients with recurrent or metastatic disease, remains controversial. Folfirinox, a combination of fluorouracil, leucovorin and oxaliplatin, is another promising regimen. Liver-directed therapy with antibodies or irradiation has been investigated for the treatment of primary or metastatic HCC in patients with cirrhosis. These therapies may eventually improve the prognosis of HCC in cirrhosis; however, further randomized trials are required.Liked something you've read?
