This tutorial shows you the basics of the elements of Photoshop. We'll go through the basics of resizing, cropping and rotating an image, how to overlay two images, how to edit an image using filters and finally, how to convert an image into a web format. Editor's note: These instructions were originally written for a version of Photoshop Elements 13. They may differ slightly from the latest version of Elements, so please verify the instructions before trying them out yourself. Photoshop Elements 13 – Resizing, Cropping and Rotating an Image To display the guide or content on mobile devices, please click here. For this tutorial, we'll be using a picture of Sting. In this tutorial, we'll be going through all the steps to resize an image for web use. We'll also be adding a background, rotating the image 90 degrees clockwise and clipping the top and bottom of the image. 1) Open the image Load the image that you want to edit into the workspace. In this case, we're using the picture of Sting. We'll start with a picture of Sting from somewhere between 2009 and 2010. The photo is approximately 2000 x 1656 pixels. You can find the original image of Sting on the internet and download it with a download manager. 2) Change the size of the image to fit on the screen On the top left of the workspace, click on the symbol that looks like a double arrow with a line over it to drag the edge of the image to fill up most of the screen. Drag the edges so that the image is 300 x 500 pixels. 3) Reset the position of the image Now that the size of the image is right, we can move the picture of Sting to the exact place we want it on the screen. We'll start by clicking on the four-line symbol at the top left of the workspace to resize the workspace. Then we'll drag the image of Sting from the working area back into the position we want it to be on the screen. You can see below where the picture of Sting is positioned on the screen. Now we need to make sure that the image of Sting is the right size and in the right place on the screen. 4) Change the size of the image Now that the picture of Sting is in the right position on the screen 05a79cecff

California is getting its first taste of what a Trump administration could look like. His election led to the resignation of all eight members of the state's powerful bipartisan Independent Redistricting Commission. The panel's next meeting in Santa Clara is on Wednesday, a day when election analysts expect the Republican to win the presidency. The panel's supporters see it as the only state independent commission left, and say that California is uniquely vulnerable to gerrymandering, which they fear will increase the numbers of Republican seats in the state House of Representatives. But a compromise bill written by state Sen. Connie Leyva (D) that would make the commission advisory only, rather than unelected, is at an impasse in Sacramento. The deadline to pass a budget and get the rest of California's budget and fiscal year out of the way has come and gone. It's unclear if there's time this year to do what Democrats want, to extend legislative control over a commission that has been trying to create districts that are more compact and break political ties. Advisory boards set up in most states to help the politicians choose the boundaries aren't uncommon. An Iowa panel considered by the courts to be tainted can be revived if a new commission makes up the same rules as it did before it was ruled illegal. In the California plan, most of the commission's members would be elected, which would allow for more time to hold hearings and publish maps. Some California experts have warned that a more drawn-out process could push the commission further away from adopting maps that would give Democrats a fair shake at the polls. "These panels are pretty amorphous. They're not going to have the blood, sweat and tears that goes into something like California's Constitution, which has taken 20 years to write," said Stony Brook University professor Steve Hill, who studies political representation. "They're just the wrong venue for the kinds of reforms we need." The state constitution requires independent commissions for drawing state legislative and congressional boundaries, as well as a set of electoral rules to be established by a majority vote of the people. California's commission was first formed in 2001 and adopted a set of rules that continues to be used to draw congressional, legislative and state assembly lines, though the panel's top lawyer was deposed last month as part of a lawsuit filed by a group

System Requirements:

Windows Mac Linux Android iOS And many more... Special Thanks: The APK file was made by the "Piano Amato" guy who was a very nice and patient person. It's also the reason why you're playing on a green "7" floor. (Tbh, this is an incredible work of art) Also I would like to thank Hush for the help he's provided in the project.
