Dysarthroses of the knee as a manifestation of Ehlers-Danlos syndrome type IV. Ehlers-Danlos syndrome (EDS) type IV is characterized by a generalized tissue fragility. We sought to characterize the clinical manifestations and to define the radiographic features of knee dysarthroses in EDS type IV. Nineteen patients with EDS type IV, ages 3-29 years (mean, 12 years), had knee dysarthroses. Fifteen knees underwent open reduction and internal fixation, 9 had not had knee surgery, and 9 had no surgery. One underwent stabilization with a total knee arthroplasty and five had limb-lengthening procedures. Radiographs of all knees were reviewed for the presence of osteochondral fragmentation. The average length of followup was 6 years. Twenty-six of the knees had the classical knee range-of-motion (ROM) findings of a genu varum. These findings were present in 91% of knees in patients younger than 13 years, 60% in patients 13 years to 19 years, and 0% in patients 20 years to 29 years. The lowest level of functional ROM was 20 degrees in patients older than 20 years and in patients who had a previous operation for the knee, compared with 18 degrees in patients younger than 20 years ($p = 0.06$). Seventy-six percent of the knees had knee pain. Radiographic osteochondral fragmentation was present in 92% of knees in patients younger than 13 years, 70% in patients 13 years to 19 years, and 67% in patients 20 years to 29 years. Radiographic fragmentation was absent in patients treated surgically. EDS type IV is characterized by a generalized tissue fragility, including the ligaments, menisci, and cartilage. Routine knee surgery in patients with knee dysarth

Diagnosis and management of malignant pleural effusion in China: a review of the literature. Malignant pleural effusion is a common complication of cancer. Its treatment involves relief of symptoms, prevention of infection and delay of disease progression. Medical treatment is recommended as the first choice. Depending on the primary tumor, treatment strategies include systemic chemotherapy, local treatment, pleurodesis and external pleural drainage. High-dose systemic chemotherapy using cisplatin, gemcitabine or paclitaxel and transcatheter arterial chemoembolization remain the first line of treatment, while other local therapies are used as palliative treatment. Pleurodesis by chemical pleurodesis or surgical pleurectomy are the second choice. Exposure to maternal depression can persist and be transmitted to the next generation, but the biological mechanisms are largely unknown. A recent study in mice shows that maternal stress affects the behavior and physiology of male pups. These epigenetic changes in adults may affect the behavior and physiology of offspring, increasing their vulnerability to depression. `b7e8fdf5c8`
