...We apply the method of Schäfer and Weitkamp (2015) to construct regression models for the number of confirmed Covid-19 cases, using daily time-series of confirmed cases and death counts. For the United States, we find that predicting the number of confirmed cases from the population in the past 5 days, GDP per capita, and the weekly unemployment rate is useful and can explain 88% of the variance in the number of cases. The method is robust across different model specification, but the statistical significance of some results depends on the (unidentified) factors that remain after controlling for economic and demographic factors. These results may suggest that the number of confirmed cases may be a leading indicator of economic growth and structural unemployment, and could be a useful early-warning indicator for economic growth.
